Hollywood babylon full movie

It couldn't be more authentic hollywood than this ridiculous warehouse for original movie scripts, movie clips and movie posters old and new. An alternative to the kitschy tourist traps that surround it, Hollywood movie posters are unusually shreeathed in the back corner of the centuries-old Artisans Patio complex. Located across hollywood Blvd from the Egyptian Theatre, boring owner Ronald Borst stocks space items to bring appropriate film goers of every generation. Movie posters in full-size shops range from vintage (Angels over Broadway, 1940) to trendy new ones (Harry Potter and twilight films). Police cars in West Hollywood say a lot about the city. Such vehicles are, as a rule, pointlessly nonsensical authoritarian emblems, but here they are interrogated by a colorful rainbow – a symbol of the gay rights movement. Weho, as the city is nicknamed, has many gay people: more than a third of the population according to official estimates. And this cultural identity has a tangible presence on the city streets. West Hollywood's reputation for social tolerance developed long before it became a nod to the gay community. Like so many areas in greater Los Angeles, it was shaped by a film business and was in its 20s, when the booming film-picture industry burned the railways at the top of the economic food chain. When the studios moved, the neighborhood (until 1984 did not become its city) blossomed into a fashionable and hedonistic place to play. Swank hotels and restaurants have multiplied across the part of Sunset Boulevard, known as the Sunset Strip, and the silver canvas of beau monde - Clark Gable, Lana Turner, Marilyn Monroe and many more - has thickened into such famous nightclubs as Ciro's and Mocambo. 1 --> --> -->
